

I am keen to find out if there is a timeline in which Flashbots believes it will open source it's builder? (this is a followup to Discord)

I think it would both provide much greater clarity to the users of Flashbots Protect as to what the protection effectively provides, as well as make the builder market more contestable by lowering the entry costs.

A AGPL license like in the relayer would be extremely appropriate to ameliorate the risk of helping efforts to monopolize the builder market behind the network effects of exclusive orderflow.

For me personally it would make experiments around user welfare maximizing builder mechanisms much more feasible than having to start from the builder example and having to rebuild the bundle and inclusion logic.
