It's excellent news that the Vault's operations have achieved such outstanding results, especially during these downturns, demonstrating that these strategies are effectively counteracting retail trading. In this case, the protocol has managed to capture a portion of these losses.

A detailed analysis of the wallets that profited during these downturns is necessary to gain insight into these capital flows. The Vault's current profits stand at $200,000. The market environment and probably some optimization in the Vault's operations partially explain these results, which are indeed excellent news.

However, part of this profitability might also stem from slightly wider spreads, which I believe are offsetting operational losses but should be narrowed as much as possible to make the exchange more competitive.

Volume is growing, which is excellent news, although I think the ultimate boost would come from outpacing the market's growth.

We are in an excellent market moment; the project is starting to shift momentum, and these positive results from the Vault confirm that the work being done on the Vault is yielding results.
