This is great. I was just thinking how I could speed up this neutralization code, and this looks perfect. Something I noticed in the code I pulled down from github is that they have converted the numbers to float 32 datatype for this step, probably to save time. So that actually is going to also be less accurate that what you're suggesting. Without the conversion, the datatype should be float 64. With your version it is still running pretty quickly.