I think you could test this yourself by training models on many different subsets of eras, and then seeing if they perform way way better on their direct neighbors than they do on slightly less distant neighbors. If the difference here is large then maybe you'll want to embargo the data yourself, but if negligible then it means no need to worry