Are you assuming that the return for each round is independent of the return of previous rounds? This ignores the autocorrelation of returns across time, which will bias your results.

You could also put some very bad returns in a number of consecutive eras for shock testing and see how that affects results. To be on the safe side, you should study scenarios that are not very likely but are still possible.